Key challenges

Payroll processing is time-consuming and can be complex for many companies. Below are some of the common payroll challenges companies encounter on a daily basis:

Ever-changing government regulations and requirements across Asia

One of the biggest challenges when processing payroll for Asian countries is understanding and staying up to date with local regulations. With different countries following different regulations and procedures, it is difficult for overseas based HR teams to efficiently handle local payroll requirements. Also, the interpretation and implementation of even nationwide policies can vary at local levels increasing compliance risks.

Working with multiple providers across different countries and cities

Due to the varying nature of HR & payroll regulations across different countries, many businesses operating internationally must hire separate service providers for each country they are active in. These local providers are often only able to offer a limited number of services. To fully cover all of their HR and payroll needs in one country, companies must hire multiple local providers. Central HR teams must work with and manage these external service providers, creating higher internal administrative costs.

Differences in reporting standards and language barriers

For non-English speaking countries, when creating payroll reports, local HR teams typically use their own reporting templates to be in compliance with local regulations.

These may be difficult to understand for a company's headquarters where they may be used to the universal reporting system. Reports made by these teams are also usually written in the local language and then translated into your chosen language. Language barriers may compromise the quality of these reports, causing them to be unclear and missing key information.

Central HR & payroll teams must also compile these multiple reports into one standardized report which can be timeconsuming and result in poor quality reports.
